'The first showing happens online'

...Even traditional stagers, like Nadia Vee, a designer based in Long Island, New York, says that virtual staging has a place.

When she recently staged a six-bedroom luxury home, she physically designed five main rooms -- the kitchen, living room, dining room, bedroom and bath. But there were a few other spaces she felt buyers needed help to visualize.

So she virtually staged the guest bedrooms and a home office and placed an image in each room, along with one item, a chair, maybe, or a desk.

"It is very helpful for people who saw the first glimpse of the home online to see the idea of it in person," she says.
